penurious and fawning people and it is hard for them not to become either cynical or domineering.

There has undoubtedly been much searching of heart of late, and many missionaries are trying to get closer to the heart of India and to overcome the obstacles of out-of-date methods, large bungalows and inherited traditions. The ashrams where Indian and foreigner are trying to live a simple common life and be of use to the people round them are undoubtedly an improvement, but it is no good saying that missionaries are generally looked upon with affection, for they are not. It will be a long time before they can win again the trust and love of the people.[1]

[1] Cf. also p. 181, et seq.